

Chetan joined Amazon after an almost 7 year stint at Google. He comes with a wealth of public policy and business experience, working in some of the most demanding and challenging Indian corporate policy environments. During his time at Google, he built an exceptionally strong team, initiated many proactive partnerships with Central and State governments, and strategically re-positioned the company and its reputation in India across a diverse set of political and policy stakeholders, including at the very highest levels.

Prior to joining Google, Chetan was Director, Corporate affairs at Dell India for five years, and previously led Public Policy at Intel, including serving as the TA to the President of Intel. At Intel he won the Intel Achievement Award (IAA) – the company's highest award. Less than 1% Intel employees win the coveted award. Chetan began his career as a journalist and has worked for some of India's most renowned publications, including the Times of India, where he headed the newspaper's technology bureau.

In his free time, Chetan likes to read (non-fiction), listen to Indian classical music, and, if the weather permits, "run a few miles"
